

Exhibit A:

Photos of Reagan Ranch Interpretive Panel

A FUTURE PRESIDENT'S RANCH

By 1951, then actor Ronald Reagan purchased several parcels creating the approximately 357-acre ranch that spreads out before you and runs for 1.5 miles along Mulholland Highway. For the next fifteen years, Reagan bred thoroughbred horses at the ranch he named "Yearling Row", and enjoyed riding and jumping his own horses. This is where he brought his future wife Nancy when they began dating and later after they married they would continue to return with their children.

When Reagan purchased the ranch it included a barn, blacksmith shop, pool with bathhouse and a simple ranch house he and Nancy used mostly on weekends. The only building Reagan added was the six-stall stable at the end of the road.

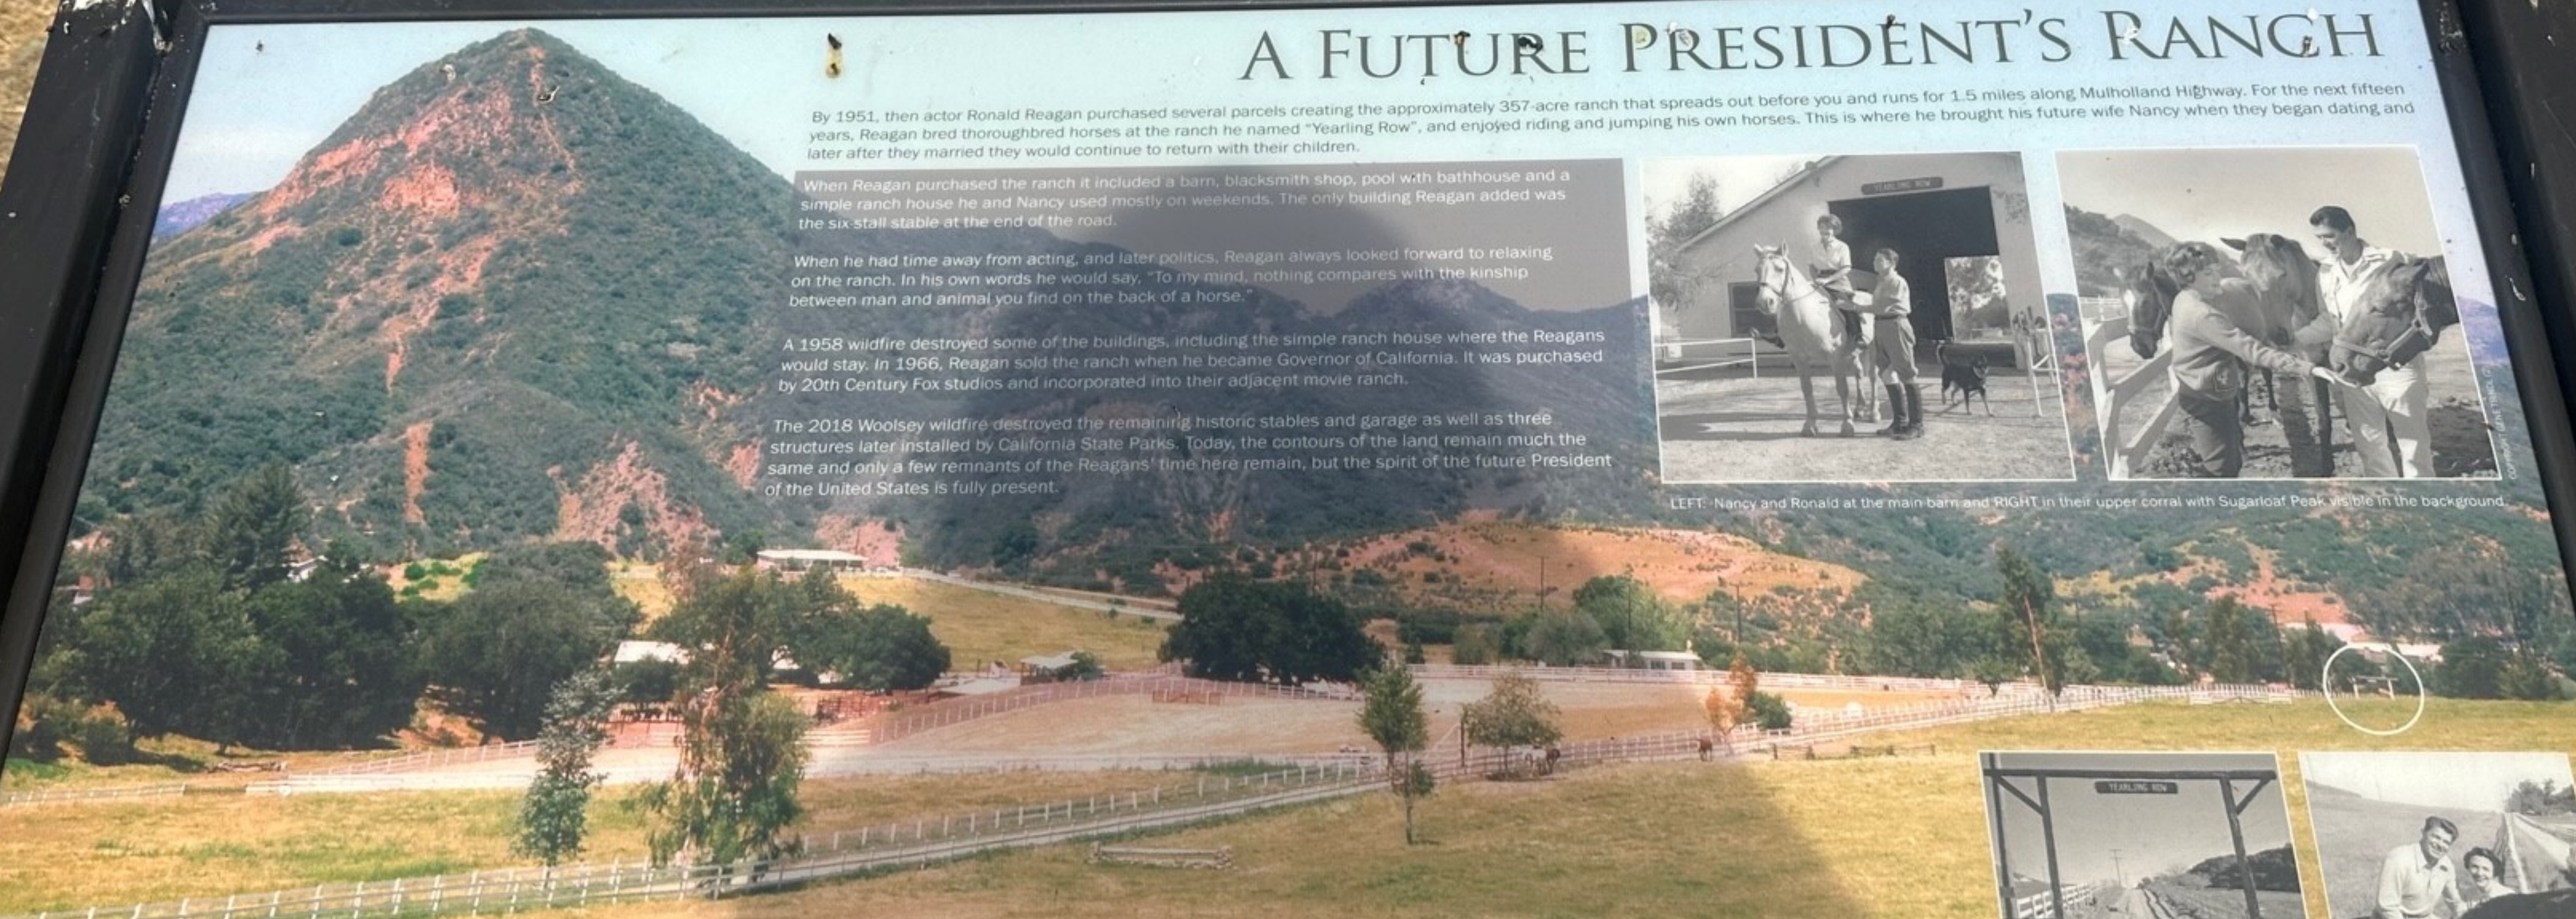

When he had time away from acting, and later politics, Reagan always looked forward to relaxing on the ranch. In his own words he would say, "To my mind, nothing compares with the kinship between man and animal you find on the back of a horse."

A 1958 wildfire destroyed some of the buildings, including the simple ranch house where the Reagans would stay. In 1966, Reagan sold the ranch when he became Governor of California. It was purchased by 20th Century Fox studios and incorporated into their adjacent movie ranch.

The 2018 Woolsey wildfire destroyed the remaining historic stables and garage as well as three structures later installed by California State Parks. Today, the contours of the land remain much the same and only a few remnants of the Reagans' time here remain, but the spirit of the future President of the United States is fully present.

LEFT: Nancy and Ronald at the main barn and RIGHT in their upper corral with Sugarloaf Peak visible in the background.

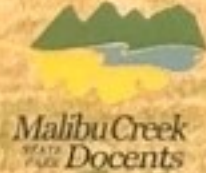

THE REAGAN RANCH IN 1965

Background image courtesy of Leon Levinson & Audrey Bishop

The original main entry was at the corner of Mulholland Highway and Lake Vista Drive (see circle above). These photos are looking in from that corner.

A FUTURE PRESIDENT'S RANGH

In 1954, when John Doolittle Reagan purchased the approximately 267-acre ranch that currently sits before you, just north for 2.5 miles along Mulholland Highway, the site was a mix of agricultural and residential land. The ranch was a mix of agricultural and residential land. The ranch was a mix of agricultural and residential land. The ranch was a mix of agricultural and residential land.

THE REAGAN RANCH IN 1965

Back ground image: 1965 photo of John & Nancy Reagan's ranch